You're thinking NASA spends it's time playing KSP for inspiration and technical inovation?

You would be wrong.

He's right, actually.

People won't get fired because they disagree with you on a gaming forum. Especially not about such a silly topic.

But they do when they violate their company's code of conduct.

Since, obviously, you don't have reasons to fear for your job, then obviously whatever code of conduct you follow (if any) is not as harsh as NASA's. What means that you don't have connections there. What means that your previous arguments on this thread have little to no value. 🤪

--- EDIT

* I swear by God, this auto-corrector is trolling me.

No employee gets fired from NASA for correcting your wild speculations about how stuff is being done.

There is also a lot of projection involved. You are calling people insane just because they don't follow your irrational arguments. From the point of view of every other member of this community (or the KSP forums, you are well known for being problematic there as well) it is you who don't know how to behave properly.

But they get fired for violations of code of conduct, including INDIRECTLY. Feed (allegedly) information to someone that would use it to harass and bully kids and teenagers on a public forum could be seen as indirect violation of their code of conduct.

Working to NASA or to one of their associates is a incredibly prestigious position, and for each one that manages a position there, there're thousands of others dying to find a way to yank someone from there so they can have a chance to fill that spot themselves.

The chances that a respectable NASA associate would risk a strike over their CoC by feeding information to you is not too better than King Charles III, King of England, accepting an invitation to write the preface of my next Pulitzer Award, "Under the tinfoil hat — The true story how NASA went from a serious space agency to a PR organisation for games". 🤪

* I really hate this markup system, you know?

* And, yeah. Typos.
